Section 2: the kite's path Address: The kite's path is a method of flight that makes use of very high speed, straightline, forward motion across the surface of the water. The path's advantages include: A kite can travel faster in the same length of time with less energy than a single-line flyer, making it better for long flights and for approaching the water from land, since it can make a landing with less effort. Because the kite does not need to be flown or pulled toward the water, it can travel farther, much farther, than other forms of flying. A kite can travel in a variety of directions, unlike other forms of flying, and as a straight line it can maneuver very quickly, in the same way that a dart can travel very quickly. Kites were used by ancient Chinese, Babylonians, Assyrians, Sumerians and Egyptians. In the Philippines, kites are called ikid and literally means "go across the sky". They were used in religious ceremonies, especially by the peoples of the Batanes islands and Luzon. The first recorded use of the word ikid is in the 17th-century book Bibliotheca Privelegii ad Insulam Batanum, written in the Filipino language by Franciscan Fr. Francisco San Buenaventura in 1667. There are slight differences between Philippine and American kites in their materials, but they both use
